A broad flat-cut polki collar of ninety-two uncut diamonds, each set by hand in 24kt kundan on a 22kt gold body, finished with a fringe of basra pearls. The reverse is enameled in deep green meenakari — a detail nobody but the wearer will ever see, which has always struck us as the correct reason to do it properly.

The Atelier

Three rooms above a lane in Jaipur's Civil Lines, forty-one karigars, and a set of techniques that have not meaningfully changed since the Mughal court — because nobody has yet improved on them.

NINETY-TWO YEARS

The register

1934 — A bench and a ledger
Hansraj Soni opens a single bench off Johari Bazaar, taking commissions for kundan work from families in Jaipur and Bikaner. The first ledger entry — a pair of jhumkas — is still in the safe.

1961 — The meenakari room
His son brings two enamellers from Nathdwara and adds a firing room. It is the decision that gives the house its colour, and the reason the Bagh collection exists at all.

1988 — Refusing the machine
Cast settings arrive in the trade and cut costs by four fifths. The house declines. Several karigars leave for workshops that adopt them; most come back within three years.

2004 — The Delhi salon
A viewing room opens in Chanakyapuri — by appointment only, with no window display, on the grounds that nobody should choose polki from the pavement.

2026 — Forty-one at the bench
Three generations working together, forty-eight pieces in the current register, and a restoration service that has never turned away a piece the house made.
